State vet: Vaccinate livestock against rabies

State Veterinarian Doug Meckes is encouraging North Carolina livestock owners to consider having their animals vaccinated against rabies.

"This year we have seen five cases of rabies in livestock," Meckes said. "Horses, cattle and goats are naturally curious animals, which puts them at risk for a bite if a rabid animal gets through their fence line."

North Carolina averages about five livestock rabies cases per year. It is transmitted primarily in saliva through a bite. Livestock infected with rabies usually appear depressed, have a lack of appetite; difficulty eating, drinking or swallowing; profuse salivation; blindness; head-pressing; circling; vocalization; fever; strained defecation; increased sexual excitement or activity; limp tail, anus, or tongue. Constant yawning, itching or nibbling may be a sign of rabies, too. Rabies can be associated with neurological problems such as incoordination, decreased muscle tone and reflexes, shifting lameness, or partial-to-complete paralysis. Horse owners should be aware that rabies can often mimic symptoms of colic in horses.

The incubation for rabies is between two weeks and six months. Once symptoms appear, the disease is almost always fatal.

education will be emphasized during the first year of implementation to give FDA more time to develop guidance and to complete development of regulator training programs.

That has been NASDA members' position for some time. We know these will be significant changes and FDA has heard plenty from producers and ag groups about this. Everyone is going to need time to fine-tune operations and get this right.

Gottlieb's comments signal that states will have some more time to educate producers about the changes and what they will mean, and we will be able to have an on-farm readiness review process that will help producers identify areas that will require attention to meet the new rules.

We want to bring producers into compliance, not simply penalize them. Focusing on education in the first year will go a long way in achieving that.

Another bit of welcomed news involves water standards and testing methods. Gottlieb also noted an extension of time on compliance dates and the opportunity for more stakeholder engagement in response to concerns raised by NASDA members.

This will extend compliance dates by two to four years and allow for review of testing methods, which should provide producers with more practical water quality expectations. Again, this should also prove more achievable in terms of outcomes. I am pleased the FDA listened and has been responsive to the concerns raised. We all want the same results in the end, but it is important how we get there.

With food demand expected to rise 70-100 percent in the next three decades, we don't need to be regulating farmers out of business. There are practical and reasonable ways we can address food safety concerns without causing the collapse of farms.

When I was first elected as Agriculture Commissioner, I did not know a whole lot about NASDA. I was aware of the group, but I quickly learned just how important a role it plays as a collective voice for agriculture.

I value my friendships with other state agriculture commissioners and secretaries, and while we each have specific

We received some very welcomed news coming out of the recent meeting of the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture concerning the rollout of the Produce Safety Rule under the Food Safety Modernization Act.

Forest Service offers post-storm tips on assessing tree damage

A weakened Hurricane Irma brought strong winds and rain to North Carolina that could have affected forestland and trees.

The N.C. Forest Service encourages landowners and others to exercise caution when assessing storm damage to their woodlands or trees around their homes. Those concerned about the health of their trees should seek advice from their county ranger or other forestry professionals.

Storm damage could include uprooting, wounding, bending and breaking of trees. Standing water, which often accompanies hurricanes, can cause added stress and mortality. The NCFS can help with post-storm inspection, or owners can hire a consulting forester for large tract of lands and an arborist for trees around their homes.

Woodland damage

“Woodlands are often more resilient than we think and will likely recover,” said Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler. “If you’re a landowner concerned about your woodlands, talk to your county ranger or a consulting forester who can help you determine if you need a plan for managing damaged timber.”

A management plan should be requested as soon as possible to assess any damage and recommend mitigation measures. A sketch map or aerial photograph of the affected area can also be helpful. The next step is to ground check the damage to determine the need for salvaging the timber. Any salvage operation will depend on location, amount and type of damage, and management objectives.

It is important that landowners have a written contract before selling any of their salvage timber to protect their financial interests. A consulting forester can help with appraising the value of timber and what markets may be available. A management plan will help with planning for the future of the woodlands once the damage is cleared.

Residential tree assessment

State Forester David Lane said that after a storm, hasty or emotional decisions about damaged trees can result in unnecessary removals or drastic pruning. Proper and professional pruning practices can help a tree recover from the storm damage. How long that takes can depend on the amount and extent of damage, the tree species and its initial health and age. “A reputable certified arborist can help advise on management, pruning and removal decisions based on your situation,” Lane said.

If homeowners decide to prune their own trees, it’s important to follow basic safety rules:

Watch for downed utility lines and treat them all as live until a utility company official has determined the line is not energized. Even cable TV lines can carry electric current if they contact a power line.

Be safe with chain saws. Operation of a chain saw in normal conditions can be dangerous. The aftermath of a storm is not the time for inexperienced users to learn.

Work with an established, local tree service if necessary. Hire only an International Society of Arboriculture Certified Arborist.

Tree damage and tree failures can cause property damage, but the possibility of tree failures can be managed.

To learn more about recovering from storms and fires, go to <http://ncforestservice.gov> and follow the links under “Managing Your Forest” and “Urban and Community Forestry.” Contact information for county rangers also is available on the website.

Two NCD&CS employees honored for their work

Two N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services employees were recently recognized for their leadership and work.

Joe Reardon, assistant commissioner for consumer protection, received the James A. Graham Award at the annual meeting of the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture in New Orleans.

The award recognizes an individual for outstanding work in providing service to agricultural producers.

Reardon has served the department in various regulatory positions for over 30 years and has also worked cooperatively with state departments of agriculture during his tenure at the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. Reardon’s leadership, vision and strategic direction increased collaboration and communication with federal, state and local partners to achieve a national integrated food safety system.

“There is so much talent working to advance American agriculture in our departments, talent that often goes unrecognized. NASDA’s Honor Awards Program provides our members the opportunity to recognize their staff for their work on a national stage,” said NASDA President and Louisiana Commissioner of Agriculture & Forestry Dr. Michael G. Strain.

NCD&CS forester David Schnake was recognized by the

David Schnake

Joe Reardon

North Carolina Wildlife Federation with the Land Conservationist of the Year award. It was presented at the 54th Annual Governor’s Conservation Achievement Awards. These prestigious awards are the highest natural resource honors given in the state.

As the forest research operation manager for the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services, Schnake is responsible for more than 25 land projects spanning 17,000 diversely forested acres. Developing comprehensive land conservation and restoration planning for shortleaf pine and oak savanna ecosystems are among Schnake’s studies and efforts. His expertise has furthered the sustainable management and conservation of longleaf pine forest ecosystems.

This year’s winners are exceedingly notable conservation devotees who span the range of water quality advocates, land stewardship champions and leaders in the preservation of unique ecosystems.

“Each year we are amazed at the commitment and creativity of North Carolina citizens in protecting wildlife and wild places,” said T. Edward Nickens, NCWF Awards Committee Chair. “This awards program brings together a remarkably diverse group of conservationists to highlight the ‘good news’ about wildlife conservation in North Carolina.”

The North Carolina Wildlife Federation first presented its conservation awards in 1958.

Ray Starling, far right, talks with agricultural leaders at an informal roundtable meeting hosted by Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler, center. Starling is the former general counsel for the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services, and now serves as special assistant to the president for agriculture, trade and food assistance.

concerns and interests regarding what's best for farmers and agriculture in our states, there are plenty of issues of common concern. I am grateful we have this organization to speak on behalf of farmers and agribusiness owners across the country, and it is rewarding when we see evidence that these efforts have been heard.

I will certainly keep you up-to-date as FSMA and water standards rules move forward. Education and the on-farm reviews will be critical to successfully navigating these extraordinary changes.

I want to mention another item of interest. I recently hosted an informal roundtable discussion with Ray Starling, special assistant to the president for agriculture, trade and food assistance. I was pleased we were joined by more than 50 agricultural leaders from across the state. Topics included international trade, access to labor, regulatory reform, and infrastructure improvements that could benefit U.S. agriculture. Starling is a North Carolina native and former general counsel at the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services. It was good to see him back in his home state and I appreciate the time he took to hear from ag leaders about what's happening in agriculture in North Carolina.

Rabies

Do not feed or attract wildlife to your yard or try to capture wild animals.

Call your local animal control if you notice a nocturnal animal out during the day and demonstrating strange behavior such as no fear of humans or aggressive behavior.

If you hunt, use gloves while skinning animals, particularly when handling nerve tissue or organs.

If you are scratched or come into contact with the saliva of an animal you suspect was rabid, seek medical attention immediately.

Livestock owners should discuss with their veterinarians about the risk of rabies in their area and preventive vaccinations.
